

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

Disclosed are methods and apparatus for effectively correlating messages sent between services. In general, a message interchange network is configured to manage the use of services by remote entities or services within a computer network. In general terms, correlation information is stored for each message. The correlation information includes information for correlating each message with a specific call between two services and a specific session between two or more services.